At Trees For Tomorrow,
we stress these major
messages:

1. Humans rely on natural resources for survival and quality of life.
2. Our natural resource base is limited, and demand is increasing, so proper management and responsible use is essential.
3. The Great Lakes forest ecosystem is resilient and is sustainable when properly managed.
4. Natural resources – forests, water, wildlife, soils, and others – are globally interdependent. One cannot be managed without considering the effect on all others.
5. Forest resources must be managed for multiple uses for the long-term benefit of everyone. These multiple uses include forest products, recreation, aesthetics, wildlife, wilderness, and others.
6. Individuals have a responsibility to make informed decisions and take positive action on natural resource issues.
