What We Do

Sustaining the world we live in through exploration and the science of nature.

The great outdoors – a perfect combination of wonder, adventure, fresh air, and recreation. From teaching about sustainable natural resource management and introductions to careers in natural resources, to digging into the history and science behind the planet we live on, Trees For Tomorrow's professional educators and natural resource partners empower people of all ages to become responsible stewards of our natural world.

Every year Trees For Tomorrow (TFT) educates approximately 10,000 people about sustainable use of our natural resources. Of those, about 6,000 are K12 school-aged children and K12 teachers from almost 100 schools in the Great Lakes states.

Our core programs focus on the interconnectivity of forests, wildlife, soils, water and energy including the role we all have in determining the ultimate outcome and health of our environment.

What makes Trees For Tomorrow so unique? We do not tell our students what to think—our professional educators use the beautiful Northwoods to provide balanced messages based on the science of natural resource management. Students become scientists and explorers at Trees For Tomorrow, getting first-hand experiences in the outdoors while making personal observations and collecting data based on what is really happening in the outdoors – not just what they read about.

In an era when people are increasingly indoors and alienated from their natural surroundings, TFT is re-introducing students of all ages to the outdoors and showing them how important our natural resources are to the world in which we all live.
